

APPENDIX

The appendix "The Principles of Newspeak" details the ideology behind Newspeak, the official language of Oceania in 1984, designed to serve the needs of Ingsoc, or English Socialism. Although not yet a sole means of communication, Newspeak was gradually being adopted among Party members, with the aim of replacing Oldspeak by 2050. The language's development focused on creating a vocabulary that not only expressed the thoughts permissible under Ingsoc but also eliminated any form of dissenting thought.

Newspeak sought to render heretical thoughts unthinkable by limiting vocabulary and simplifying grammar. For instance, the word "free" could only express physical absence, negating any concepts of political or intellectual freedom, effectively making such thoughts nameless. This reduction of vocabulary was crucial for diminishing the range of thought and intention behind language use.

The vocabulary was categorized into three classes: A, B, and C. The A vocabulary included everyday words for basic activities with rigid meanings devoid of nuance, disallowing any literary or complex discourse. The grammar promoted interchangeability between parts of speech, creating simplified forms. Adjectives and adverbs were formed by adding specific suffixes, further reducing complexity.

The B vocabulary was distinct for its political implications. It consisted of compound words intended to convey specific ideological attitudes, often obscuring broader meanings and requiring a deep understanding of Ingsoc to use them correctly. These terms served as shorthand for complex ideas while diminishing the complexity of thought.

Finally, the C vocabulary addressed scientific and technical terms, defined strictly to avoid undesirable connotations. Overall, Newspeak was constructed to suppress opposing ideas, making it nearly impossible to articulate unorthodox opinions. By the time Newspeak was fully adopted, the distinctions of Oldspeak would be lost, severing ties to previous concepts of freedom, equality, and objective thought, ultimately narrowing perspectives and maintaining control over the populace's minds through the language itself.
